

Take a Note

Think about being a student and chances are you will picture a person taking notes or writing an essay.

After a brain injury or concussion, people, but especially students, can find it difficult to put their thoughts into writing. Going to class and listening, deciding what's important and writing a note to remember is difficult at the best of times. After a brain injury, even writing something as seemingly simple as an email, can seem impossible.

Speech Language Pathologists are critical rehabilitation team members when the goal is returning to work or school: They understand the complexity of being able to put thoughts to paper.
